CAMPAIGN 2008
June 26-28, 2007

Many Americans are looking for even more choices in the race for the presidency than the 18 announced candidates they now have:

- Should Fred Thompson decide to officially enter the race for the Republican nomination, he is already a strong contender, tying John McCain for second place, after Rudy Giuliani.
- Americans would like a third political party (especially self-described Independents, and primary voters who say they are dissatisfied with their current choices) -- but Americans have historically liked the idea of more candidate choices.

But as of now, most don't know much about or have an opinion of New York City Mayor Mike Bloomberg, who recently dropped out of the Republican Party, perhaps in anticipation of a run at the presidency in 2008 as a third-party candidate.

And on the Democratic side, where most primary voters are satisfied with the choices, Hillary Clinton continues to lead Barack Obama.

MIKE BLOOMBERG AND A THIRD PARTY

New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg's recent party registration change from Republican to "Unaffiliated" has many speculating that he is preparing an independent run for President. That speculation has sparked debate about the need for a third political party.

53% say that a third party is needed to compete with the Democratic and Republican parties. 41% disagree. These views are similar to what they were in 1996, and in 1992 voters also expressed the desire for a new party.

Half of both Republicans and Democrats do not think there is a need for a third political party, but 71% of Independents say there is.

DOES THE COUNTRY NEED A THIRD POLITICAL PARTY?

	Now	3/1996
Yes	53%	53%
No	41	42

Bloomberg himself, however, is not well known. Most Americans are undecided or don't know enough about Bloomberg, and those with an opinion are divided about him.

Bloomberg is popular among his constituents at home; and nationally, 72% of Americans hold a favorable view of New York City. 13% have a bad image. Since the 9/11 attacks, Americans have held extremely positive views of the Big Apple.

As has been the case since the start of this early campaign, Democratic primary voters continue to be satisfied with their presidential candidates, while Republican primary voters are still looking for more choices. Only 30% of Republicans are satisfied with their candidates - the lowest number ever. Even though another contender, former Senator Fred Thompson, is poised to enter the race soon, at this point, 61% of Republican primary voters want more choices.

What may be another indication of dissatisfaction among Republicans is that 56% admit they are not enthusiastic about any of the presidential candidates. Actor and former Senator Fred Thompson, who has yet to enter the race, tops the list among Republican primary voters as the candidate they are most enthusiastic about with 12%, followed by Rudy Giuliani at 9%.

More Democratic voters are enthusiastic. Among Democratic primary voters, Hillary Clinton (28%) and Barack Obama (22%) top the list as the candidates they are most enthusiastic about. 38% say they are not enthusiastic about a particular candidate.

While some voters may be less than enthusiastic about the candidates, most are paying attention to the 2008 presidential campaign. Seven in 10 are paying a lot or some attention.

THE REPUBLICAN NOMINATION FIGHT

Former Senator Fred Thompson has not quite entered the Republican nomination race, but he is casting a long shadow over it.

When registered voters who say they will vote in a Republican primary or caucus are given a choice among three declared candidates - Rudy Giuliani, John McCain and Mitt Romney - the race for the nomination stands about where it did last month, with Giuliani well in the lead, and about one in five voters wanting someone other than those three.

But when Fred Thompson's name is added to that list, the Tennessean vaults into the top tier -- though Giuliani still leads. Thompson's support appears to come heavily from those looking for "someone else," and some from Giuliani.

All the contenders tested in this poll are seen as sharing the values of most Republicans, although Giuliani is the most likely of them to be seen as not doing so. Sentiments on this haven't changed in the last month. Fred Thompson is believed to share Republican values, though many do not know enough about him to say.

THE DEMOCRATS

Hillary Clinton maintains her lead in a three-way race over Democrats Barack Obama and John Edwards. Among registered voters who say they plan to vote in a Democratic primary or caucus, 48% would like to see her as the Democratic nominee, while 24% would like to see Obama as the nominee and 11% prefer John Edwards. Those figures have changed little since last month.

Clinton leads among both men and women who say they will vote in a Democratic primary. She also enjoys stronger support than Obama among liberals, while among moderates they run about evenly.

Positive opinions of Clinton, Obama and Edwards have risen in this poll. 67% of Democratic primary voters now have a favorable opinion of Clinton, up from 62% in May. 54% have a favorable view of Obama, up from 44%, and positive views of Edwards are now at 50%, up from 45%.

Governor Bill Richardson is not well-known: just 7% have a favorable impression of the Governor of New Mexico, 11% are unfavorable, and 81% are undecided or haven't heard enough about him yet to have an opinion.

Hillary Clinton's gender won't be an issue for most voters; majorities of Democratic primary voters, and voters overall, say that most people they know would vote for a woman. However, sizable minorities think it would be an issue for the people they know. Republicans and conservatives are more likely than Democrats and liberals to say people they know would not vote for a woman; of course, in the context of this election year, voting for a woman probably does mean voting for Senator Clinton.

And the presence of her husband as Clinton campaigns may help her. 51% of voters overall, and 77% of Democratic primary voters, have a favorable opinion of former President Bill Clinton. (75% of Republican primary voters have an unfavorable view of him though.)

One prominent figure in Democratic politics not currently running for President -- former Vice President Al Gore -- is viewed positively by party loyalists but less so among voters overall. 55% of Democratic primary voters view Gore favorably. But among all voters, just 34% do, and even more, 40%, have a negative view. That's not much different than in April.

RELIGION AND POLITICS

Voters are divided on whether it is okay for political candidates to talk about their religion while campaigning. 50% think it is appropriate, while 48% disagree. Voters expressed similar views in the spring of the 2004 presidential campaign.

Two-thirds of Republicans (65%) say it is okay for candidates to talk about their religion, while 57% of Democrats say it is not. White evangelicals are especially likely to say such discussion by candidates is appropriate - three in four think it is. Protestants in general think political candidates talking about their religion is appropriate, but Catholics disagree.

Voters are less tolerant of mixing religion and politics when it comes to talk by religious leaders. Most voters (70%) think it is inappropriate for religious leaders to urge people to vote for or against a political candidate. Back in May 2004, 63% said such conduct was inappropriate.

Majorities of both Democrats and Republicans think such urging by religious leaders is unacceptable, but Republicans are twice as likely as Democrats to say it is appropriate. White evangelicals are more divided on the question. A majority of regular churchgoers say it is inappropriate for religious leaders to urge people to vote for or against a political candidate.

Six in ten voters say it is not very important for a presidential candidate to share their religious beliefs, but 38% say that it is. Those most likely to say it is important are Republicans, white evangelicals, and those who attend religious services regularly.
